Bioequity

Bioequity is a concept of bioequalism, considered as an advance of the concept life forms are the same, but that the differences between them must be considered, in order to maintain plurality and in such a way that there are no injustices, such as racism, xenophobia and the like, when it comes to analyzing life forms.

The term bioequity is considered as the solidification of the basis of bioequalism, as it does not aim to understand all forms of life as being solid blocks, where all blocks are equal. Rather, consider the differences and the different formats between life forms, considering their abilities, their capacities among other differences, in order to consider diversity and understand the unity of life forms in the diversity and plurality of existence.

Bioequity does not aim to eliminate the concept of bioequality, but to complement the concept, in order to take the differences and the plurality of life forms when it comes to saying that all forms of life are the same. Thus, it can be said that all forms of life are equal and unique, where equality and unity come together, and can speak of biounicity, all forms of life are unique, as a complement to bioequality and bioequity.

Along with the concept of bioequity, we can also speak of the concept of geoequity, considering the differences of each place and world, and of oniequity, considering the differences of everything and everyone. And also, being able to speak of geounicity, all places and worlds are unique, and of omniunicity, everything and everyone is unique.
